

Using a home-made rock saw, Claude Conder of Provo slices through specimen. Rocks are hobby.

A special polish is given to pretty stones in this "tumbler" which Mr. Conder made from scrap.

Provo Rockhound, 79, Hunts For Nature's Handiwork

By LEO PERRY
Deseret News Staff Writer

When the average hiker or hunter takes to the mountains, his interest in rocks usually centers around whether they hurt his feet or whether they will fall on his head.

Not so with 79-year-old Claude Conder of Provo and hundreds of other Utahns whose hobby is scientific rockhunting, otherwise known as mineralogy.

Much of Claude's vacations include side trips into most of the Western States where he searches for rock specimens. "You have miles and miles of walking to do," he admits.

USES HAMMER

After trudging over the hills in search of pretty rocks, petrified wood and dinosaur bones, Claude puts his collection to hammer and chisel or to his special rock-cutting saw. The saw, which Mr. Conder constructed after viewing one in a magazine, makes a clean, smooth cut across a rock surface much like a baker slicing a loaf of bread. All the beauties of nature's handiwork can be displayed across the rock's face.

BUILDS TUMBLER

Mr. Conder, who worked as mechanic and troubleshooter for Utah Power and Light Co. for more than 40 years, has the talent to combine his rockhound hobby with his mechanic ability. He constructed a "home-made" tumbler which smooths and polishes smaller stones into gems of unusual luster. The tumbler runs on one batch of stones for six weeks but three different adhesive compounds are added to grind away sharp edges and rough sides. The finished product is a stone of real beauty.

STORES ROCKS

Mr. Conder would be in a good position if the neighborhood was involved in a rock fight. He has several tons of rocks stored on special racks built outside his garage. These will give him ample material to occupy his day hours during the winter time.

A member of the Timpanogos Gem and Mineral Club in Utah County, Mr. Conder meets with other club members often and they "talk shop." He points out that members of the club tell each other about new rock fields, and methods of finishing the rocks into a work of art.

MAKES GEMS

Many of the collectors finish their rough rocks into real gems. A gem qualifies for that label if it is beautiful, durable and rare.

Many of the finished stones, Mr. Conder gives to members of his family, especially his grandchildren. Some are taken by his daughter, Vera Conder of Provo who finishes them into articles of jewelry including bracelets, rings and tie clasps.

But for the beginning rockhound no special skill or equipment is needed. "The real fun comes from walking on the hills and watching for that special rock which might just be a step ahead," Mr. Conder explains.

DISPLAY ROCKS

After collection, the hobby can be diverted into many forms. Some hobbyists simply clean and display their rocks in special cases. Others cut and polish their rocks into shining gems. Still others carry the art a step further by making jewelry carve the wood or rock into figures or other finished forms.

Elderly Conder claims that rockhounding is perfect for seniors who can't stand "just sit around. It gives you a chance to roam around and see some of the country's fine beauty spots," he says.
